I would like to have a more realistic look of steel what color is used? its not red and then only yellowish things which is more easy to make? how is it reinforced? where does it came from? A: This is what I made, I was thinking that it would be easy to make with a cnc machine or laser cutting but I can't afford it yet. 1st thing was to add knurling and try to get the colors right. Because of the softness of the material, I chose to use a stapler to set the shape. After that, I did a tight weave in the metal with a flexible wire and filled the whole thing with rust-proof powder. It was pretty easy. The present study is a study of community perceptions of the quality of undergraduate medical education and its relevance to the practice of medicine. It is a cross-sectional survey conducted in a single city in the United Kingdom. Surveys were distributed by post, sent through university mailing lists and delivered to all departments of a single medical school. The response rate was approximately 80%, reflecting the willingness of medical schools to allow recruitment for a study on undergraduate education. We achieved a reasonably large sample size and carefully measured a broad range of variables, including the student's own understanding of their training. The main findings of the study were that students were aware that undergraduate training was inadequate. The quality of training was deemed to be poor by students and doctors. There was very little evidence of a difference in quality between the hospital and the non-hospital based undergraduate programs. Our finding that students and doctors were aware that undergraduate training was inadequate is not unexpected. The level of dissatisfaction with undergraduate medical education is well documented and has been recognized as a source of 'disillusionment' among doctors ([@bib2], [@bib5]). In the UK, this disillusionment has led to a growing commitment to training, even at an undergraduate level, that is both more intense and more challenging than in the past
