Helicobacter pylori vacA and cagA vacuolating cytotoxin alleles in patients with atypical gastritis and gastric ulcer. The vacuolating cytotoxin (VacA) produced by Helicobacter pylori has been suggested to be associated with atypical gastritis and gastric ulcer. In the present study, we investigated H. pylori vacA and cagA alleles in 37 patients with atypical gastritis or gastric ulcer, and compared the results with those of 30 H. pylori-positive patients without atypical gastritis or gastric ulcer. We determined the vacA s1a region (corresponding to the vacuolating cytotoxin region of the vacA gene) and cagA genotype in all the H. pylori-positive patients. Patients with atypical gastritis or gastric ulcer were categorized into two groups: the atypical gastritis group (n = 17) and the gastric ulcer group (n = 20).

Compared with patients without atypical gastritis or gastric ulcer, patients with atypical gastritis or gastric ulcer were more likely to harbor H. pylori carrying s1a+ and cagA+ alleles
